What is regulation?

In certain areas across North America, energy prices remain regulated. This means that all energy providing processes including pricing are governed by a regulatory or government body, with only the local utility able to sell directly to consumers. The utility or government set the prices for natural gas and electricity supply, along with the associated transportation and distribution costs associated with those commodities. Consumers therefore have no choice when it comes to their energy provider.

What is deregulation?

Deregulation has taken place in many states and provinces throughout North America. It has allowed competitive energy suppliers, such as Just Energy, to enter the markets and offer their energy supply products to consumers. Energy prices are not regulated in these areas and consumers are not forced to receive supply from their utility. In deregulated markets, consumers can choose their supplier, similar to other common household service providers. The marketing of these services is still regulated.

Where does electricity come from?

There are a variety of sources of electricity:

Fossil fuels

The burning of coal, natural gas and oil in power plants using gas turbines or heat engines produces heat which, when combined with steam, generates electricity.

Nuclear power

Nuclear fission is used to split atoms and harness the energy released to generate heat and electricity.

Hydro/wind

Water and wind are used in dams and windmills to power turbines that create heat and electricity.

Solar

The sun's rays are harnessed by photovoltaic panels that allow electrons to move freely among them, eventually meeting a circuit wire and converting into electricity.

Geothermal

This form of energy is generated in the Earth's core which has temperatures hotter than the sun's surface produced by the slow decay of radioactive particles, a process that occurs in all rocks.

Which sources of power contribute to pollution?

Although the cheapest form of generating power is through the burning of fossil fuels such as coal, natural gas and oil, it is also the most hazardous to the environment. The burning of these fuels releases carbon dioxide into the atmosphere which has been linked to serious environmental complications including: global warming, climate change, air pollution, natural disasters, habitat destruction and chronic health problems.

Which sources of power are green?

Energy generated through renewable sources such as hydro, wind, solar and geothermal are green. Unlike fossil fuels, these sources of power do not deplete natural resources. They are also cleaner sources of energy that do not pollute the environment with carbon emissions.

Although renewable energy sources are better for the health of our planet, they typically cost more than other sources of energy, which is why the majority of our electricity is not generated from green sources.

What is price volatility?

Price volatility describes how quickly or widely prices can change. In the energy industry this refers to electricity and/or natural gas supply prices, relative to consumer demand.

What causes price volatility?

Energy prices fluctuate based on changes in supply and demand. When energy supply increases, prices tend to go down and when there is a shortage, prices go up. When demand for energy increases, prices increase and when it decreases, prices tend to fall.

The following factors impact supply and demand and contribute to price volatility:

Extreme weather conditions - Extreme hot or cold temperatures will increase energy demand, driving costs up. Likewise, extreme weather conditions such as hurricanes can disrupt supply and also elevate costs.

Economic conditions - Growing economies with increased infrastructure demands drive up energy demand and costs. Poorly performing economies often result in reduced demand and lower costs.

Availability of supply - The majority of the energy we use is generated from fossil fuels such as coal and natural gas. This is generally the cheapest form of energy generation. When there is a shortage of these fossil fuels, other more expensive forms of energy generation will need to be used resulting in higher energy prices.

How do different energy products help control price volatility?

Variable rate plans mirror market rates. As such, customers on these plans are exposed to market price volatility. A variable rate plan is ideal when rates are relatively stable or expected to decrease.

Fixed rate plans offer customers a set rate for their commodity supply over a period of time. These plans provide protection from market price volatility as your rate is fixed and not affected by changes in commodity prices.

What does the market look like today?

Commodity supply prices differ by region and face their own market conditions, production challenges and transportation methods. Click here to learn more about the prices we offer in your region.

Why is deregulation important?

Deregulation gives consumers choice - the power of the buyer. A deregulated market allows you to choose your commodity supplier. It also motivates retailers to differentiate their products from the utility and those of competitors by developing innovative features, pricing plans and options that would have otherwise not been available to you. Green energy products are an example of innovative programs made possible by retailers like Just Energy. In deregulated electricity markets, these products support the generation and injection of renewable energy into your electricity grid, making it greener than it otherwise would have been. In a deregulated natural gas market, these green products support emission reduction projects that prevent polluting gases from entering the atmosphere and help contribute to a cleaner, greener environment.

What does it mean for you?

The utility is still responsible for the distribution of the commodity to your home regardless of the supplier you choose. The supply price however is not set by that same utility. Depending on where you live, you may continue to be billed by your utility with a mention of your supplier, or be billed directly by your supplier.

Competitive rates

You now have options to choose your provider, like Just Energy, to offer competitive pricing.

Innovative products

With more competition in the market, you benefit from a variety of product options that may have otherwise not been available to you, including JustGreen, which ensures that the equivalent of up to 100% of the energy you consume is offset by sustainable energy sources.

No service interruptions

Although your natural gas and/or electricity supply will be coming from a new source, your local utility/distribution company will continue to ensure the consistent delivery of the energy to your home.

Energy Deregulation State By State Breakdown

Deregulation: Separating the Supplier from the Deliverer.

When Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and 13 other states deregulated their energy markets, local utility companies in those states were forced to sell their power generation plants. They held on to all their transmission and distribution assets and continue to maintain this infrastructure.

The energy supply industry in these deregulated states was opened up to independent energy companies like Verde Energy USA and thus consumers in these states have the opportunity to choose who they get their power from. Now residents and businesses do not have to accept their utility company (or their price) for electricity supply.

Energy companies like Verde Energy USA provide energy to the community at competitive pricing. This often means they can provide electricity at a significantly reduced rate compared to the utility company's rates. This in turn can save households and businesses hundreds or thousands of dollars annually depending on their electricity consumption.
